

As we all know, themes play an important part in photography and last January's top entries definitely captured the stories each photographer wanted to convey. Last month, water seemed to be big in the themes tackled by our top enthusiasts. Back-to-back Master Photographer of the Year for 2015 and 2016 Jijo de Guzman started the year with a big bang!

First Place: Jijo de Guzman

His entries – a creek that seems to flow down from Mount Mayon and a calm rocky seaside sunset - went to first and fourth place in the judges' score sheets making him January 2017's top photographer.

Second Place: Kakai Arroyo

Kakai Arroyos' second place entry was taken by the shore in Basque Country in Spain and was recently – just last week - chosen as top photo for the day in National Geographic's Your Shot webpage. On Kakai's Facebook post, she said "para na rin akong nanalo ng Miss Universe!" Her other entry that went to fifth place was a magnificent night view of the Hong Kong skyline. In the third spot is Paul San Pedro and both his shots featured reflections – one was an image of a quaint town by the lake with red gable-roofed houses against a blue and green background created by the aurora borealis. Paul's other entry was a majestic rocky mountain at sunset that was perfectly reflected on a small pool of water.

Placing fourth as top photographer is Adel Samson with his two entries showcasing the beauty water in different settings. One is an image of ice melting on a beach that seems to gently recede at sunset and the other, of an old man on a bamboo raft in Ha Long Bay against the dramatic background of limestone islands at sunrise. Next, Joey Antonio's entries were taken from two very different worlds. One is a shot of a sandstone canyon rendered in red and purple that seems to turn something that's rock solid into something that's fluid and flowing. His other entry is almost entirely in white with sprinkles of bright colors from skis and snowboards in a winter resort.

Another entry with water as a backdrop was from Dindin Lagdameo that caught a flock of birds landing and feeding on water, wings spread, one perfectly and vertically aligned on top of the other. "Frozen" seems to be the theme of Tony Cancio's entries that put him in seventh place. A snow-covered rocky mountain range bathe in early morning light evokes the calm of a very good morning for photography. His other entry tells the story of a solitary home by the sea in winter time.

Sixth Place: Dindin Lagdameo

Seventh Place: Tony Cancio

Eighth Place: Bob Sison

In eighth position is Bob Sison with his landscape shot of a Buddhist temple on a rocky cliff in Bhutan that invites one to pack his gear and head off to the Himalaya mountain range and shoot the day away! A different take on the mother and child theme may describe Master Photographer Rey Ortiz's entry. A mother with obvious joy on her face carries her child on her back right where light and shadow divide the image and seems to allude to the journey into the unknown that both of them are to just starting to make.

Finally, Manny Gaité's silhouette of a boy fishing on calm water wonderfully captures the ripples made by his fishing rod that extend all across the photo and seems convey the effect each one plays in this world.

So there you go folks! This year's Master Cup is off to an exciting start with the January Open Competition. With the upcoming themes already published, let's get our gears packed and ready and explore the world through photography!

NEW YEAR'S TOAST TO HOPE

Swiss Embassy partners with CCP's Doc Adel

Last January 11, New Year's Toast to Hope opened. It is a fund-raising exhibit hosted by Swiss Ambassador to the Philippines, her excellency, Madame Andrea Reichlin.

Aside from Adel's photos which were exhibited and sold during the event, it also featured products from different Fil-Swiss business partners in the Philippines such as Swiss watches and Swiss chocolate.

Says Adel: "The Swiss embassy needed a photographer to shoot their project on the beautiful sights there. It needs to sell the photos to their benefactors to raise funds for buildings and school children's shoes."

"Leica being a major sponsor tapped me to go and shoot between January 10 and 11, 2017. I donated all the photos for the exhibit and framed eight photos and put them on sale. I donated all the photos for the exhibit for anything for my services."

Mon Marcos: Time for Real Fellowship

Mon Marcos's face would light up whenever he reminisced about the good old days of the Camera Club of the Philippines (CCP).

In the early 1970s, he would relate, a group of young photography hobbyists would meet in coffee shops to discuss about forming a photography club. At that time, there already was a Camera Club of the Philippines (CCP) with only 20 to 30 relatively old members. The Club then did not have a probationary period. The young photography enthusiasts would eventually join the Club and become the core group of the "new CCP." Mon Marcos was one of them.

Back then, there were also infighting and heated debates during the Club's monthly meetings, but everything always worked out in the end. Fellowship events were especially memorable because the Club held plays and musicals which involved the members' whole families.

Mon and Bobby Paterno were put in charge of these performances. They would compose and write the plays which were usually three to four fairy tales rolled into one story: Sleeping Beauty, Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs, The Three Little Pigs, and Little Red Riding Hood. They also had turn-of-the-century stories with characters depicting Hitler, Mussolini, Franco, and the Maharaja. Even when Mon became the Club President, he still actively participated in these plays. In one such play, he played the Narrator, dressed as an English soldier in knee-length short pants and beret.

He and Bobby made sure that each CCP member, wife and child would have a part in each play. Roles -- from the leads to the supporting characters -- were diligently assigned to suit the capability and personality of the Club member or relative. The Chinese members, for example, who found it difficult to enunciate well the English dialogue were given the roles of the seven dwarfs because they could effortlessly warble "Hi-ho, Hi-ho!" Mortifying roles were given to prestigious members. Doc Amado Castro, who was at that time the esteemed Dean of the School of Economics of the University of the Philippines, was assigned the role of one of the Three Little Pigs.

Behind the closed doors of the Hotel InterContinental Ballroom, away from public view and the prying paparazzi's eyes, everybody let their hair down to give life to their assigned characters. No matter how peculiar or comical they may have looked, they would nonchalantly walk around the banquet hall in their oftentimes uncomfortable costumes. Even Don Jaime Zobel, Dr. Lizardo, Vic Valenciano, Manu Legarda had no qualms dancing the limbo rock during such events.

Indeed, those were halcyon days for CCP lifetime members like Mon Marcos. It is his fervent wish that such activities be revived to give both old and new Club members opportunities for real fellowship. He believes that promoting fun and fellowship would help strengthen the CCP as one family.
